Not illustrated. 1909 Excerpt: .is given only by copper, and by that only in the flam-vie ware produced by the so-called reduced firing, in which, after the usual firing, the outside air with its supply of oxygen is shut off and the wares in the kiln left in a still longer and higher degree of heat. In this intolerable temperature the green which the copper would naturally produce is transformed into a species of glowing crim-son. But frequently it ap-pears only as a faint sug-gestion; all color may disappear and the vase emerge practically white. The metals used for the colors are the oxides, car-bonates and sulphates; the carbonates are copper, lead and tin; the oxides, copper, manganese, tin, zinc, antj mony, cobalt, and iron. In general, the colors and their properties are much the same as in other pigments used by painters, but there are also exceptions--oxide of chromium...
